01 There are no tricks, I discuss the rules together with the children.

02 Be a role model yourself and design things in a playful way.

03 Concerns that certain content not suitable for children may "pop up". I would always stay with the child, watch/use it together with the child. Restrictions like time limit for the app.

04 That the digital tool is managed, used with grown-ups.

05 I think an app is better, because you can adjust the basic conditions better and the security in regards of pop-ups is better.

06 An app is easier for children to use because it can be set up with more guidance. So they know exactly what and where they can press a button.

07 I don't like the function of anonymity so much, because especially older teenagers take advantage of this for negative things. I see the chat function also as kitschy, because this way even people can spread things that shouldn't be seen by children.

08 I think the idea of an app would be good if I, as a mother, could inform myself about it in advance. An internet version would not be so good because of the many dangers. I would like it if the Kreisjugendring could provide direct information about this app / a person in charge of the app there.

09 Video chats, short videos for explanation.

10 Yes, this is already important to parents. They attach great importance that their children get in contact with people of the same age. Depending on the topic, one can also have mature conversations with much younger children (toddlers).

11 I think you can expect a high participation from parents if the reasons mentioned in question 10 are important to them.
